Q1:

I think Australia should have a new framework for classification.

Q2:

To inform people of what content they are likely to find, so they can make informed decisions on whether to view some item.

Q3:

No.

Q4:

Yes - it is likely that most people will be aware of what they will and/or will not enjoy without classification. If their assumptions are proven to be incorrect though, then it is possible that the particular item might be deceptively described to potential viewers and thus require independent classification.

Q5:

No.

Q6:

No.

Q7:

No.

Q8:

Yes.

Q9:

No.

Q10:

No.

Q11:

None.

Q12:

There should be no access control for any content online - a classification is for information only, not enforcement.

Q13:

Education is the only answer to this question, for both children and their parents.

Q14:

There should be no access control for any content offline - a classification is for information only, not enforcement.

Q15:

When it may be unclear what the content may contain.

Q16:

Government should setup the framework, while industry bodies should be responsible for accurately determining the classification of content they produce. Users should be able to give feedback to both the industry and government in cases where they feel the classification is inappropriate.

Q17:

I strongly believe this would be a superior solution.

Q18:

Any and all content should be classified by industry.

Q19:

Government should make the process of submitting a self-assessment of content classification a very inexpensive and quick process (eg. an online tool). This method should be available for all content.

Q20:

They are well understood.

Q21:

No.

Q22:

There is no need.

Q23:

If it will allow for adults to play games that they wish to play, then I would support such a move.

Q24:

Illegal content. However, it should only be prohibited to view such material - there should not be any technological measures to prevent viewing. As with all things, it is the user that has to be ultimately responsible for their own actions.

Q25:

No - it is too broad.

Q26:

Very important. This can be achieved by federalising the classification laws.

Q27:

I'm not a legislator.

Q28:

Yes, there should be no need for state-dependent laws in this matter.

Q29:

There should be much greater freedom for adults to choose what content they consume, provided it is not illegal.
