Q1:

Either a new framework or completely overhauling the existing framework.

Q2:

To ensure that content be made freely available to those considered to have the right of legal access.

Q3:

Any medium where dynamic and/or user-generated content is the bulk of the content provided would be unfeasible to classify with any timeliness, so should, at best, carry a warning that content featured is not classified.

Q4:

If it's within a system where content refused classification is not allowed to be sold then content should be subject to classification or reclassification if sufficient complaints have been made.

Otherwise it should be taken on a case by case basis.

Q5:

Q6:

If smaller development/publishing/film/etc companies did not have to get their content classified it could mean a lot more small, independent works would be able to get to market or have incentive to get to market.

Q7:

Q8:

In the case of books: If a physical book's classification should carry over to its audio book's classification. For audio works (which aren't music) that are considered to be "Original" there should be some sort of classification system, even if honorary.

Q12:

Netnanny or Opt-In Filtering. Any other method of filtering that does not occur at the user end will only hamper internet connection speeds.

Q13:

Netnanny, url logging forwarded to parents.

Q14:

Put it all behind the counter or introduce plain packaging. Harsher penalties for businesses caught selling to minors.

Q15:

For video content a 5 second clip appended to the beginning of all features that is unskippable and informs the consumer of any content which may cause distress to the viewer. Packaging could have bigger warning labels depending on the rating i.e. the current small label for G content, slightly bigger for PG, etc... with MA15+ and R18+ obscuring the front cover, possibly done as a shrink rap.

Q20:

M and MA15+. A lot of people get them confused and think that M is a more restricted category than MA.
