Q1:

New Framework

Q2:

The Internet should be treated as a public library or public service and access to all parts of it should be unrestricted.

Q3:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q4:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q5:

No. There should be no regulation. Parents should be responsible for the actions of their children.

Q6:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q7:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q8:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q9:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q10:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q11:

If the government regulates content, and offending content slips through, is the government ultimately responsible for reparations to individuals that are offended?

Q12:

You cannot effectively restrict access to the Internet. Examine the multibillion dollar attempts of China - and they still have leaks of information bot out and into their country. At what dollar amount will Australia admit defeat? 100 million? 500 million? At what point does one draw the line and say "You cannot carry sand in a sieve?"

Q13:

No. There should be no regulation of content. Parents are responsible for the actions of their children.

Q14:

No. There should be no regulation of content. Adults are able to make legal decisions for themselves.

Q15:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q16:

No. There should be no regulation of content. Only net neutrality should be enforced to ensure equal access to all content by every user on any device connected to the internet.

Q17:

Industry regulation by content producers is fine. The distribution of content or the reception of content should be unregulated.

Q18:

No. There should be no regulation of content.

Q19:

No. There should be no regulation of content. There should be no subsidization of content. If the government gives money to an industry that offends, is the government responsible for monetary reparations if someone is offended?

Q20:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q21:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q22:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q23:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q24:

There should be no regulation of content. If you hide material of an illegal nature, how will you catch those that distribute that illegal material? Do you really want to create an Internet arms race where increasingly difficult encryption schemes and other technological advances are made to thwart law enforcement? Openness breeds laxness.

Q25:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q26:

There should be no regulation of content.

Q27:

There should be no regulation of content. If content is regulated, and someone is offended, is the government responsible for reparations?

There should be no regulation of content.

Q29:

There should be no regulation of content.

Other comments:

I beg of you, as an American citizen, do not allow your government to be swayed by fear-mongers or capitalist thugs. An open Internet is easily regulated - Offenders are easily caught because the system does not encourage them to hide their activities. And ultimately, when viewing content - when did it become the responsibility of the State to regulate what Adults watch? And are not children supposed to be reared by their parents and instilled with virtues and morality? If something slips by your monitors, will you pay compensation to those offended?

Please, we are fighting a battle for freedom in America. Carry on that fight in Australia. Protect us from those that would Protect Us.

I am a parent of four children, and I know every single day what they are doing on the Internet, in my home, in our neighborhood, and in the public school. I am responsible for my children, not the State. It is a heavy burden, but one that I shouldered when I became a father. No one promised me it would be an easy job, and no one promised me help. Please allow your citizens to raise their own children, to assume the responsibility of being a parent and not shirk that most sacred of duties.
