

CI 1567 W Baldwin

First name: Will

Last name: Baldwin

Q1:

yes

Q2:

I would like the national classification to be the same as for video and film

Q3:

no

Q4:

yes

Q5:

no

Q6:

No. While marketing campaigns do raise awareness, often material reaches the mass market by word of mouth.

Q7:

No

Q8:

No.

Q9:

No.

Q10:

Yes.

Q11:

Q12:

Q13:

This is the problem with children and inappropriate content. Many parents will buy the game for their child as their child hears from friends about the content. The key is to raise awareness. And parental controls

Q14:

It can't. Focus on the online sector

Q15:

Q16:

Q17:

Q18:

Violence, sexual references, nudity, blood and gore, adult themes, coarse language

Q19:

Q20:

PG and M are a little confusing as where the line is drawn between the 2.

Q21:

revise PG and M. see if there is an outstanding factor between the 2

Q22:

the video and film classification is great as it is recognisable and easy to read. This should be made consistent across all media

Q23:

Yes.

Q24:

Entirely prohibited? Good luck. Probably extreme violence and Child pornography

Q25:

no.

Q26:

Classification should be consistent. Think about it. What's the point of different classifications? A universal classification would be easier for travellers going to different states

Q27:

Don't replace it. Just refigure your bearings. Figure out what you want to achieve

Q28:

Why not. That will give Today Tonight something to talk about

Q29:

Other comments:

Don't abuse the R+18 rating for media. If you make it exclusive to adults of films like Rambo or Mortal Kombat, minors will envy and will try to obtain a copy through illegal downloading or bugging their parents. Yes it's bloody but they're gonna get it one way or the other you might as well make it legal. Can you also reassess the ratings on some older media? They might have been in that certain classification when it was released but nowadays the bad animation or effects take the horror or impact out of the scenes. By the way contrary to popular belief kids aren't going to go on killing sprees because they have played a violent game. You know the firearm laws; you set them.