Q1:

The ALRC should focus on developing a new framework for classification.

Q2:

The primary objectives of a national classification scheme should be:

- Consistency across the board, covering all forms of media.
- Ensuring that adults are NOT severely inhibited relative to the ability to access certain content, i.e. an UNBIASED classification scheme.
- Providing a clear, concise and easy-to-understand guideline for classifications.

Q3:

The technology/platform used to access content should be taken into account when classifying their respective content (e.g. video game consoles), however they should NOT themselves be classified. If it were to be classified, then essentially there is a risk of technologies and platforms either being restricted to adult use or being banned outright, thus severely discouraging local development and production of media, along with severely affecting the technology, gaming, and media industries, and drastically encouraging a black market in selling banned material.

Q4:

It would depend on the delivery platform, the nature of the content, and the material that is used in the content.

It's really up to parents to ensure that their children do not access potentially inappropriate material.
