Q1:

Yes

Q2:

To unify the classification scheme across all media sold to the public (Film, TV & Games) giving parents clear guidelines for what will be appropriate for their children. it should also treat over 18's as adult and allow them access to material with mature themes. having R18 for all media better protects children and parents from making ill informed purchasing decisions.

Q3:

Ideally no, practically yes. international online platforms (such as the apple app store) which have pre defined classifications and millions of apps which are made with such low budgets they wouldn't be able to afford classification over here present one situation where insisting on local classification would be impractical.

Q4:

No. the classification is there to prevent complaints. by informing the public.

Q5:

no sure I understand the question here. I'm going to say no it shouldn't.

Q6:

This is tricky, ideally no it should come into consideration.

Q7:

if the work in line with other media guidelines is unsuitable for under 18's, yes

Q8:

yes

Q9:

Q15:

if the product requires it under the classification guidelines

Q16:

governments should, without infringing on civil liberties attempt to control illegal activities. what is and isn't illegal should be made clear to the general public.

the government and industries should present the public with clear guidelines to help the public make educated decision about what they and their children see.

users are ultimately responsible of what they (or their children) consume if the above criteria is met.
